He would not say now that provided by Mr. Porter: he had erred, though he was disposed to modify the decree on account of unusual circumstances which had been presented. As between the minority and majority stockholders alone he would allow the decree to stand, but there was another party to be considered, the users of water who ,though they had no legal rights in the case had an overwhelming interest in the immediate future of the canal. The A Man court had reason to believe that there were no other prospective purchasers of the canal than the majority bondholders and he also had reason to believe that they would not pay more than $100,000.
